Dear OHSU Hiring Team,

The programs I'm proudest of are the ones where the logistics were invisible because they just worked—the right people in the room, the materials ready, the follow-up tracked, and the impact measured afterward. That's the craft of program administration, and it's what drew me to coordinating OHSU's statewide perinatal simulation program. As a Portland resident with a master's in Applied Organizational Psychology, I'm genuinely excited by the chance to bring that coordination discipline to work that helps Oregon hospitals deliver safer care for mothers and newborns.

This is the work I do now at InGenius Prep, where I manage 20+ programs and 10+ vendors end-to-end—owning the delivery logistics, documentation, and day-to-day coordination, and refining each program through feedback analysis. I built the cross-functional processes and documentation that support 70+ staff and cut onboarding time by 75%, and I regularly run the logistics for live training sessions reaching 600+ participants. Serving as a reliable, organized point of coordination across many moving parts and stakeholders is the center of my role, which maps closely to convening simulations across multiple hospital sites.

Measurement is the part I care about most, and it's a strong match here. Through my consulting work with Organization Development Network (ODN) Oregon, I facilitate stakeholder interviews to diagnose root causes, then design and monitor evaluation measures—recently quantifying $362K in leave costs and translating the findings into executive-ready insights that drove policy redesigns. At NextGen Healthcare, I analyzed 2,000+ employee survey responses and turned them into reports leaders acted on. Designing evaluation metrics, tracking program performance, and reporting results clearly are already core parts of how I work.

I want to be candid about fit. My background is in organizational and program work rather than clinical healthcare, so I haven't worked in a simulation or quality-improvement setting before, and I'd be learning that domain context on the job. What I bring is exactly the administrative and coordination backbone the role is built on—program logistics across multiple stakeholders, evaluation design and data reporting, budget and vendor tracking, and a genuinely organized, people-centered way of working—plus real enthusiasm for OHSU's mission. I'd be grateful for the chance to contribute. Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,

Jamie Cheng
