Dear Legence Hiring Team,

I'm a Portland-based Organization & Talent Development professional, and Legence's Talent Development Generalist role caught my attention because of how precisely it maps to the work I've been doing across the talent lifecycle—onboarding, engagement, performance, succession planning, and career pathing—and the kind of enterprise program coordination I genuinely enjoy.

In my current consulting role at ODN Oregon, I've supported two concurrent OD projects: one diagnosing absenteeism drivers for an HR team (auditing 300+ leave cases and surfacing $362K in leave costs), and another helping an NGO leadership team redesign their decision-making and accountability structures through focus groups and 1:1 interviews. Both projects required translating data into insights that moved leadership to act—which is exactly what talent development work demands at the enterprise level. Before that, at InGenius Prep, I managed the end-to-end coordination of 20+ cross-functional programs, built onboarding documentation that reduced onboarding time by 75% for 70+ staff, and ran listening sessions with 25+ global stakeholders to improve program design.

I was particularly drawn to the scope of this role—the breadth of talent programs (early career, succession, career pathing, recognition, internal mobility) paired with the expectation that the Talent Development Generalist is both a coordinator and an insight-translator. My background in organizational psychology grounds my approach: I don't just execute programs, I'm always looking at the data behind them and asking what's working and what isn't.

I'd welcome the chance to bring this combination of OD rigor and program execution to Legence's Talent Development team.
