Dear Hiring Team,

I believe the best training does two things at once: it actually changes how people work, and it gets sharper every time it runs—because someone is paying attention to the data behind it. That belief is exactly why the Senior Associate, Training role at Housecall Pro caught my eye: owning both the facilitation and the development of training, working independently, and constantly improving the efficiency and efficacy of each program is the kind of L&D craft I genuinely enjoy.

At InGenius Prep, I facilitate training webinars for 600+ participants and develop the guides, workflows, and content behind them—work that drove a 78% program enrollment rate and cut onboarding time by 75% for 70+ cross-functional staff. I run needs assessments with 25+ stakeholders to find the real capability gaps before I build anything, then design the program around them. Delivering and developing training in the same role, while juggling 20+ moving programs, is the closest thing I have to this job already.

I also let the data lead. At NextGen Healthcare, I analyzed 2,000+ employee experiences and turned manager-effectiveness feedback into reports leaders could act on; through ODN Oregon, I've upskilled an HR team to surface executive-ready insights on $362K in leave costs. That analytical habit is what keeps my training honest—I'd rather measure whether a program worked than assume it did.

I approach learning the way I'd approach any experiment: form a clear hypothesis, build the program, test it with the people closest to the work, and let the results shape the next version. I'd love to bring that curious, data-driven approach to the teams—and the Pros—Housecall Pro is built to serve.

Warmly,

Jamie Cheng
