Hiring Manager

University of Portland

Portland, OR

Community engagement program management isn't just about coordinating logistics—from my experience, it's about making operational complexity invisible so the communities at the center of the program can focus on what actually matters. With a background in HR, Organizational Development, and Program Management, I have helped organizations build the cross-functional systems, listening structures, and documentation that keep complex programs running—and genuinely responsive to the people they serve. I look forward to bringing my program operations expertise, stakeholder engagement skills, and community-centered design approach to the University of Portland as a Program Manager, Community Engagement.

At InGenius Prep, I managed 20+ programs and 10+ vendors while building the cross-functional processes that kept everything running smoothly for 70+ staff—including onboarding materials that cut ramp-up time by 75%. What I'm most proud of isn't the scale; it's that we consistently got feedback from partners and participants that the program "just worked." That came from asking the right questions first: I conducted needs assessments and listening sessions with 25+ global stakeholders before making changes, and the result was three new programs that addressed actual gaps rather than assumed ones.

The community engagement dimension of this role resonates because of the nature of the populations I've coordinated: international students, cross-cultural partners, multilingual participants. Facilitating training webinars for 600+ participants across different countries required the same adaptability that community outreach demands—meeting people where they are, in the language and format that works for them.

As an analytical organizer with a growth mindset, University of Portland's Jesuit mission of service and its Portland presence are both draws that make this a role I'd invest in fully. Thank you for considering my application—I look forward to discussing how I can best contribute to the University of Portland!

Sincerely,

Jamie (Yi-Chieh) Cheng
