Hiring Manager

University of Portland

Portland, OR

Social justice education program management isn't just about facilitating difficult conversations—from my experience, it's about creating the operational and relational conditions where people can actually develop: in community, with shared values, and through an honest reckoning with the systems that shape opportunity. With a background in HR, Organizational Development, and Program Management, I have helped organizations build programming grounded in what communities actually asked for—conducting listening sessions with 25+ stakeholders and designing experiences that created real dialogue rather than assumed outcomes. I look forward to bringing my community-centered program design, facilitation experience, and cross-functional operational skills to the University of Portland as a Program Manager, Social Justice Education.

At InGenius Prep, I managed 20+ programs by facilitating stakeholder sessions, conducting needs assessments, and building programming around what communities actually asked for—with communications strategy, vendor coordination, and documentation that made the work repeatable.

At Vestas Wind Systems, I initiated and piloted an Inclusive Leadership workshop with senior leaders that was eventually expanded to 23 global locations. What made it land was the relational groundwork: understanding what those leaders were grappling with, building trust, and designing an experience that created real dialogue—the same orientation I'd bring to social justice programming.

As an analytical organizer with a growth mindset, I want to be honest: my primary background is in organizational development and HR, not academic social justice facilitation. I see this as a genuine learning opportunity, and University of Portland's Catholic Social Teaching foundation is a draw precisely because it asks for that kind of whole-person investment. Thank you for considering my application—I look forward to discussing how I can best contribute to the University of Portland!

Sincerely,

Jamie (Yi-Chieh) Cheng
