Dear Sierra Hiring Team,

Strong People Operations at an early-stage company is less about running a fixed playbook and more about building one—standardizing the messy parts of the employee lifecycle, watching the data, and refining as the org scales. That's how I approach the work, and it's why this role drew me in: the chance to help build Sierra's People playbook from the ground up while bringing AI into how a People team actually operates. I'll be candid that the posting calls for more years than I have—I'm earlier in my career, with a master's in Applied Organizational Psychology and roughly three years across People Operations, OD, and HR—but the build-and-improve work itself is exactly what I do.

Much of what this role covers maps to what I do day-to-day. At InGenius Prep, I define and refine cross-functional processes for 70+ staff, building the guides and workflows that cut onboarding time by 75%, and I manage 20+ programs and 10+ vendors end-to-end—the kind of process design and operational ownership Sierra is hiring for. I run needs assessments with 25+ stakeholders (increasingly with AI tools in the mix) and facilitate training and engagement programs for 600+ participants.

I pair that with hands-on lifecycle and people work. At Vestas Wind Systems, I optimized onboarding across three global locations through process analysis, piloted an Inclusive Leadership workshop that scaled from 12 senior leaders to 23 locations, and helped direct a Mergers & Acquisitions project. And at NextGen Healthcare, I analyzed 2,000+ employee experiences and turned that data into recommendations for the C-suite—the same instinct behind building dashboards to track People metrics and inform strategy.

What ties it together is how I work, grounded in my organizational-psychology training (MS, USC): I use data to find where people and processes struggle, stakeholder partnership to design solutions that fit, and continued measurement to make sure they hold as the company grows. I'm genuinely excited by Sierra's craftsmanship-and-intensity culture and the chance to bring AI into the People function early—and I'd welcome the conversation.

Warmly,

Jamie Cheng
