Dear Notion Hiring Team,

Great onboarding isn't about a tidy checklist—from my experience, it's about closing the gap between what a new hire is told and what actually helps them feel they made the best decision of their career. That gap only closes through a closer look at the data and real cross-functional collaboration. With a master's in Applied Organizational Psychology, I approach employee experience as a system to study: diagnose where people get stuck, design the moment that fixes it, then measure whether it landed. The chance to reinvent New Hire Onboarding as a fully immersive Day-1 experience—and to keep shaping the moments that follow—is the exact work I want to be doing.

The story closest to this role is from InGenius Prep, where I currently manage 20+ programs as Program Enablement Manager. Early on, I rebuilt our onboarding documentation and assumed adoption would follow—it didn't. So I went back, interviewed the people living it, and found the real problem was friction, not resistance: the resources existed, but nobody could find the path through them. I rebuilt it around how people actually worked and cut onboarding time 75%. That's the lesson I'd bring to Day 1 here—you don't design the experience you imagine, you design the one your customer (the new hire) actually needs, and you test it early instead of waiting for it to be perfect.

I've also done this work globally and through influence rather than mandate, which the role calls for directly. At Vestas Wind Systems, I optimized onboarding for new hires across 3 international locations by mapping each region's process against the global standard and clarifying where they diverged. I also piloted an Inclusive Leadership experience for 12 senior leaders that earned its way into 23 other locations—my first real lesson in scaling a people program by building belief and tight partnerships, not by pushing a policy.

Two things you screen for are central to how I already work. On measuring impact over participation: at NextGen Healthcare I analyzed 2,000+ employee survey responses, found manager effectiveness was the top driver of engagement, and took that to the C-suite—I care about whether a program changes behavior, not whether people merely showed up. On AI as a daily collaborator: I use it every day and am building a RAG-based job-search system with a developer friend, and I'd love to help Notinos treat AI and Notion itself as part of real workflows. I'll be candid about my growth edge—my onboarding work has been as an enablement manager and HRBP partner rather than owning a global program at Notion's scale—and that scope is exactly what draws me to this role and this team.

This is how I approach work, uniquely grounded in organizational psychology: diagnose with data, co-create the fix with cross-functional partners, then track the signals that tell me what to keep, iterate, or retire. As a curious builder with a bias toward shipping and learning, I'd be genuinely energized to help reinvent the Notino experience. Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,

Jamie Cheng
