Dear Stripe Hiring Team,

Great project management on a People team isn't just about keeping a plan on track—from my experience, it's about owning ambiguous problems end-to-end through a steady cycle of structuring the work, collecting data, aligning stakeholders, and refining as you go. That belief is why this People Project Manager role drew me in: the chance to bring project rigor to the People function and partner across pillars to deliver programs people actually adopt. I'm a People program and project manager with a master's in Applied Organizational Psychology, and I'd love to bring that to Stripe's People Operations and Insights team.

This is the core of what I do today. At InGenius Prep, I manage end-to-end project lifecycles for 20+ programs and 10+ vendors, coordinating cross-functionally with Marketing, Tech, and Sales to keep delivery on track and stakeholders aligned. I run needs assessments with 25+ stakeholders (increasingly with AI tools in the mix), build enablement and training materials that cut onboarding time by 75%, and facilitate training for 600+ participants—the kind of structured, cross-functional delivery this role calls for.

Before that, my work sharpened the analytical and stakeholder sides of the same craft. At NextGen Healthcare, I analyzed 2,000+ employee experiences and turned that data into recommendations I presented to the C-suite. At Vestas, I directed a Mergers & Acquisitions project—navigating genuinely complex organizational dynamics across functions—and optimized onboarding across 3 global locations. And in my current consulting work with ODN Oregon, I take on hard, ambiguous questions: diagnosing problems through interviews and data, then owning them from problem definition to a clear recommendation.

What ties it together is how I work, grounded in my background in organizational psychology (MS, USC): I use data collection and analysis to diagnose what's actually slowing a process down, stakeholder partnership to design a cross-functional solution, and continued measurement to make sure it sticks and improves. As an analytical organizer with a growth mindset, I'm genuinely excited by Stripe's focus on rigor, experimentation, and continuous improvement on the People team—and I'd welcome the chance to contribute.

Warmly,

Jamie Cheng
