Dear Exelon Talent, Learning & DEI Team,

The Talent Transformation Specialist role reads like a description of the work I already love most: keeping a portfolio of talent initiatives moving across many managers and partners, owning deliverables end-to-end, and turning scattered data into the dashboards and status updates that let leaders decide. Exelon's framing of this as flexible project and operational support across the Talent COE—paired with a genuine push to use GenAI to do it smarter—is exactly the lane where I do my best work, and the kind of enterprise scale I've been building toward.

At InGenius Prep, I run end-to-end program and project management across 20+ concurrent initiatives and 10+ vendors, independently managing assigned deliverables and timelines for multiple stakeholders. A large part of that is vendor coordination—tracking deliverables, invoices, and status against plan—and translating feedback and operational data into the reporting that keeps everyone aligned. I lean on AI tools daily to cut the manual overhead, and I built a self-service knowledge base of 70+ SOPs and guides that reduced onboarding time by 75%. That mix of program ownership, vendor operations, and reporting maps closely to coordinating across HR Technology, HR Analytics, Finance, and external vendors here.

The analytical and talent-strategy side of this role is where my background runs deepest. With a master's in Applied Organizational Psychology, I treat talent challenges as systems to study: through ODN Oregon I analyze talent and leave data—including a diagnosis of 300+ leave cases that surfaced $362K in costs and drove policy redesigns—and at NextGen Healthcare I analyzed 2,000+ employee data points and prepared insights for senior leadership on DEI, inclusive leadership, and performance, the same enterprise talent, culture, and inclusion themes this COE supports. I should be candid that I'd be early in my career relative to the most seasoned candidates, and I would need visa sponsorship; what I bring is the demonstrated ability to manage real deliverables independently and turn data into decisions.

What draws me specifically to Exelon is the chance to do this work where talent transformation actually carries weight—at a Fortune-200 enterprise serving millions, inside a Center of Excellence that treats culture and inclusion as initiatives worth managing rigorously. I'd be genuinely excited to bring my program-management discipline, analytical habits, and people-first instincts to the team, and to grow alongside the managers I'd be supporting.

Warm regards,

Jamie Cheng
