Dear HealthCorps Hiring Team,

The line in your posting that this role is "the connective tissue between curriculum design and program delivery" is exactly the work I find most meaningful—making sure what a team builds actually lands with the people who deliver it. I was drawn to the near-peer mentorship model immediately: deploying college-age mentors who become relatable role models for teens is a smart, human-centered design, and it only works if those mentors feel confident and prepared. Building the onboarding and professional development that gets them there is the kind of L&D problem I genuinely love. It also connects to where I started—my BA from Wesleyan was in Psychology and Education Studies, including a practicum in education—so health and learning in community settings is close to home for me.

At InGenius Prep, this is my daily work. I run needs assessments with 25+ stakeholders to find the real learning gaps, then design onboarding and training and facilitate it for 600+ participants, reaching a 78% enrollment rate. I build the practical, ready-to-use side too: a self-service knowledge base of 70+ guides and how-to resources that cut onboarding time by 75%, because I've learned that strong performance-support materials matter as much as the live sessions. I'm comfortable with instructional design frameworks and care most about applying them to real, time-constrained settings—the same question your posting raises about whether an activity actually fits a 60-minute period and the supplies a facilitator really has.

On facilitation and coaching, I've led both virtual and in-person sessions, including an Inclusive Leadership workshop I designed at Vestas for 12 senior leaders that was later expanded to 23 global locations. As a 97% extrovert, developing people face-to-face genuinely energizes me. I'll be candid that most of my facilitation has been with working professionals rather than college students specifically, but meeting learners where they are—and giving feedback that's honest and supportive without crushing confidence—is exactly how I approach coaching, and I'd be eager to adapt my formats to how this generation of mentors actually consumes content. At NextGen Healthcare I also supported L&D directly, designing survey instruments to diagnose manager-effectiveness gaps and translating the data into recommendations for senior leadership.

What pulls me to HealthCorps specifically is that this is a build-from-scratch role at a mission-obsessed organization—and I do my best work in exactly that kind of ambiguity, generating options rather than just observations when something isn't working. The chance to shape not only mentors' time at HealthCorps but how they show up as future healthcare professionals is the rare kind of impact that compounds. I'd be honored to bring that energy to your team. (For transparency: I would require visa sponsorship.)

Warm regards,

Jamie Cheng
