Dear University of Washington Hiring Team,

I was genuinely excited to come across the Learning & Development Specialist role supporting UW Facilities. The chance to design and deliver training for ~1,100 staff—and to serve as the primary instructor for a leadership program like Stepping Stones to Success—speaks directly to the work I love most: turning organizational needs into learning that people actually use and remember. As someone with a master's in Applied Organizational Psychology, I'm especially drawn to a role grounded in adult-learning principles and the ADDIE framework rather than one-off training.

In my current role as a Program Manager leading enablement at InGenius Prep, I run needs assessments with 25+ stakeholders to pinpoint learning gaps, then design and facilitate the programs that close them. I have led live training for 600+ participants and driven a 78% enrollment rate, and I built the guides, SOPs, and self-service knowledge base that reduced new-hire onboarding time by 75%. I care about whether training works, not just whether it ships—so I lean on feedback and data to evaluate effectiveness and refine each program over time, which is exactly the evaluation loop this position calls for.

I would also bring relevant breadth. Through my consulting work with the Organization Development Network of Oregon, I upskilled an HR team to audit 300+ leave cases and surface $362K in costs that drove real policy and first-aid-training changes—an example of how I use data to make the case for learning. I'm comfortable presenting to diverse audiences and mentoring others; at Vestas I designed and led an Inclusive Leadership workshop for senior leaders that later scaled across 23 locations, and I would be glad to bring that same care to mentoring the role's 1–2 interns. I should also share openly that I would require visa sponsorship, and I understand the University is able to support that.

What draws me to UW specifically is the mission—supporting the people who keep a world-class public university running—and the emphasis on developing employees at every level. I'd love to help Facilities staff grow through training that is practical, inclusive, and measured. Thank you for considering my application; I would welcome the chance to discuss how I can contribute.

Warm regards,

Jamie Cheng
