Dear Cambia Health Solutions Hiring Team,

Culture work isn't really about events on a calendar—from my experience, it's about the quieter work underneath: figuring out where people actually feel connected, where they don't, and building programs that close that gap and stick. That's the lens I'd bring to the Community and Culture Program Manager role, and it's grounded in a master's in Applied Organizational Psychology (USC) and about three years of program and people work.

Most of that work is what I do now at InGenius Prep, where I manage the full lifecycle of 20+ programs with 10+ global vendors and partner across Marketing, Tech, and Sales—no two of which keep the same schedule. I own the moving parts your role lives in: coordinating stakeholders, running communications cycles, building the documentation that keeps distributed teams aligned, and facilitating training sessions for 600+ participants. When I rolled out a new program and adoption lagged, I didn't assume people were resistant—I went back and interviewed them, found the real problem was friction rather than buy-in, and rebuilt the entry point around how they actually worked. That instinct—design the experience around the people, not around the plan—is what keeps culture programming from feeling like something done to employees rather than with them.

I've also done the inclusion and engagement work directly. At Vestas, I piloted an Inclusive Leadership workshop in an office of 22 nationalities—with no formal authority to mandate anything, so I had to build awareness, find an internal champion, and reinforce it until it stuck and scaled to 23 global locations. At NextGen Healthcare, I analyzed 2,000+ employee survey responses, found that manager effectiveness was the strongest driver of engagement, and got that finding in front of the C-suite, where it shaped the L&D strategy. I also do part-time pro bono OD consulting through Organization Development Network (ODN) Oregon, where our team helps organizations diagnose people and decision-making challenges through interviews and data.

I'll be candid: I haven't managed ERGs as a formal role before. But the core of this work—translating culture and inclusion priorities into real programs, partnering across HR and Communications, and reading whether people genuinely feel connected—is exactly what I've been doing, just under different titles. This is how I approach work, grounded in my organizational-psychology training: diagnose with data before designing, build solutions with the people they're for, and track whether they actually change behavior. Cambia is a Portland company, and a person-focused mission is one I'd be glad to help carry inside the building. I'd love to talk.

Sincerely,

Jamie Cheng
