Dear A-LIGN Hiring Team,

I'm drawn to the HR Operations Generalist role because of how explicitly it centers on data-driven judgment—not just running reports, but challenging assumptions with evidence and owning complex problems end-to-end. That's exactly how I've built my HR practice, and I'd love to bring it to A-LIGN.

The clearest example is work I'm currently doing with Organization Development Network (ODN) Oregon: I conducted CEO and HR leadership interviews to understand an absenteeism problem, then independently analyzed 300+ leave cases to surface $362K in preventable costs the organization hadn't quantified. The analysis wasn't just a summary—it challenged the team's existing framing and led directly to a policy redesign. That full-cycle ownership, from ambiguous problem to defensible recommendation, is what I find most energizing. My MS in Applied Organizational Psychology from USC gave me a strong research methods and statistics foundation, so I naturally pressure-test numbers rather than accept them at face value.

At NextGen Healthcare, I applied the same lens at larger scale: analyzing 2,000+ employee experience data points to identify satisfaction drivers and presenting those workforce insights directly to C-suite—translating complex patterns into clear, actionable recommendations rather than just reporting what the data said. At Vestas Wind Systems, I supported employee relations cases while ensuring compliance with local labor laws and maintaining confidentiality—exposure that maps well to the FMLA/ADA/FLSA/EEO guidance this role requires. And at InGenius Prep, I've built the operational side: SOPs, knowledge bases, and redesigned processes that reduced onboarding time by 75% and scaled training to 600+ participants—evidence that I can build and continuously improve HR infrastructure, not just analyze it.

A-LIGN's environment—fast-paced, compliance-centric, data-forward—feels like exactly the context where my blend of analytical rigor, process orientation, and HR fundamentals would land well. I'm excited about the opportunity to contribute as a genuine thought partner to your HR team.

Warm regards,

Jamie Cheng
