Dear Hiring Team,

I'm drawn to the People Operations Specialist role because of the emphasis on improving the employee journey at scale—not just keeping the machine running, but genuinely making it better. That tension between service excellence and continuous improvement is where I do my best work, and it's what's kept me energized across HR operations, program management, and OD consulting over the past few years.

At InGenius Prep, a fast-paced remote organization, I've supported the full operational side of the employee experience—from building onboarding materials and SOPs that cut new-hire ramp time by 75%, to redesigning manual workflows using AI tools and feedback data. I maintain a self-service knowledge base for 70+ cross-functional staff, coordinate across vendors and stakeholders on 20+ concurrent initiatives, and make sure nothing falls through the cracks when processes span teams. The work has taught me that good HR ops isn't just about executing transactions accurately—it's about designing systems people can actually use without having to ask for help every time.

On the analytical side, my consulting work with ODN Oregon gave me a different vantage point: I dug into 300+ employee leave cases, surfaced $362K in associated costs, and helped leadership see patterns that weren't visible in their existing reporting. That kind of data-to-decision work—understanding what the numbers are really saying—translates directly to the audits, compliance activities, and operational reporting this role requires. And at Vestas, supporting onboarding across three global locations and assisting with ER cases gave me early exposure to the kind of precision and discretion HR ops demands.

I'm a Jira user, comfortable with HRIS platforms, and genuinely excited about using AI-enabled tools to streamline the repetitive parts of HR so the team can focus on what actually moves the needle. I'd love to bring that same systems-thinking energy to Jobgether's partner company.

Warm regards,

Jamie Cheng
