Dear Accuris Hiring Team,

What drew me to this role is the shape of the work: a framework and lifecycle that already exist, and a single owner whose job is to give them dedicated execution capacity—create the plan, drive alignment, and surface risks before they become blockers. That is the part of program management I am genuinely good at and enjoy most. With a master's in Applied Organizational Psychology, I approach a launch the way I approach any system: diagnose where things get stuck, design the structure that keeps them moving, then track the signals that tell me whether it is working.

That is most of my day at InGenius Prep, where I currently manage 20+ concurrent programs end to end with 10+ vendors. I own each project plan from intake through launch, run the recurring sessions that keep cross-functional partners aligned, and hold the action-item and decision log so open items actually close between meetings. Coordinating across Marketing, Sales, and Operations to keep multiple efforts on track at different stages of complexity—exactly what this role calls for—is the rhythm I work in now. When I rebuilt our onboarding, I learned my most useful lesson the hard way: I shipped the documentation and assumed adoption would follow, it didn't, so I went back, interviewed the people living it, and found the real problem was friction, not resistance. Rebuilding it around how people actually worked cut onboarding time 75%. I bring that same instinct to a launch—test early, watch what people actually do, and fix the blocker rather than the symptom.

I also know how to keep work visible to the people who need to see it. At NextGen Healthcare I analyzed 2,000+ employee survey responses, synthesized the findings, and took a clear recommendation to the C-suite—translating a complex picture into something a busy leader could act on. Building executive-facing status on a regular cadence, and synthesizing for different audiences, is squarely how I already operate.

I'll be candid about my growth edge: my end-to-end launch experience has been with educational and enablement programs, not SaaS New Product Introduction or go-to-market specifically. The execution spine is the same—lifecycle ownership, cross-functional ceremonies, decision logs, risk escalation, exec reporting—but I would be learning the NPI and commercialization context, and I'm genuinely excited to. Accuris pairing a humble-hungry-smart culture with an established framework feels like the right place to bring strong execution discipline and grow into the product side fast. Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,

Jamie Cheng
