Dear Navitus Learning Services Team,

The best learning work starts with a real question—what do people actually need to do their jobs well?—and ends with evidence that the answer landed. That diagnostic, build, and measure rhythm is the work I care about, and it's why this Learning and Development Generalist role drew me in: the chance to design and deliver learning across an organization, partner with HRBPs and SMEs to find the gaps, and own the operational side that makes programs actually run.

At InGenius Prep, I do this end to end. I design and deliver interactive training webinars for 600+ participants across virtual and instructor-led formats, partner with 25+ stakeholders and subject-matter experts to run needs assessments that surface skill gaps, and translate those into 3 new learning programs. I also build the connective tissue around delivery—guides, learning materials, and workflows for 70+ cross-functional staff that cut onboarding time 75%—and I manage 20+ programs and 10+ vendors, using feedback data to measure what's working and refine what isn't. At NextGen Healthcare I analyzed 2,000+ employee experiences to guide leadership decisions, and at Organization Development Network (ODN) Oregon I upskill an HR team in data analytics, recently helping them turn an audit of 300+ leave cases into executive-ready insights.

I'll be candid about where I'd be growing: my e-learning has been built in LMS and standard tools rather than authoring courseware in Captivate or Articulate, and I'd be learning the pharmacy-benefits context from the ground up. What I bring is the foundation underneath the role—facilitation, needs assessment, LMS administration, and a measurement habit grounded in my background in organizational psychology (MS, USC, 3.95)—plus genuine eagerness to pick up the authoring tools quickly. I'd love to bring that to the Learning Services Center of Excellence at Navitus.

Warmly,

Jamie Cheng
